husband under violent, horrifying circumstances, that she too felt guilty over his death and doubted she would ever free herself of the feeling. And perhaps it was more than just a feeling. Perhaps she really was guilty. But she said nothing. There was nothing in Lady Barclay's manner to suggest that she would welcome such intimacy. Anyway, Gwen never talked about the events surrounding Vernon's death or the fall that had caused it. She suspected she never would. She never even thought about those events. Yet in some ways she never thought of anything else. Later in the evening, she admitted when asked that she played the pianoforte, though not with any particular flair or talent. It did not matter. She was persuaded to cross the drawing room on her crutches in order to sit at the instrument and play, rusty fingers and all. Fortunately, she acquitted herself tolerably well. And then she was persuaded to remain there in order to accompany Lord Darleigh as he played his violin. She moved to the harp with him afterward while he explained to her how he was learning to identify all the many strings without seeing them.
